System Requirements: Overview: The main working area is divided into three smaller windows. The first one displays all the installed system drives, the second shows which files can be recovered after a scan is made, and the third panel reveals the properties for each item. The program can recover deleted files from NTFS or FAT32 volumes using a few simple commands. Easy-to-follow steps In order to start the recovery process you will have to select the drive which includes the deleted item and use the scan functions. The scan operation can perform a quick or a full scan and determine what data can be restored. After the scan is completed, you can select the desired item from the list and check its properties to make sure you have the correct one. All you have to do next is click on the "Recover" icon to start the process. Search for the deleted items If the list contains multiple items you can locate the file very easy using the search function. Furthermore, a more complex search function is implemented which allows you to search in a specific folder by applying different filters by size, date and even deleted or existing files. This way you will narrow the results and save time in the process. Conclusion All in all, Easy Data Recovery is a simple software application great for users who need to recover different file types and want to save time for the whole operation. The app has a simple-to-use interface with intuitively placed function buttons, and this makes it an ideal candidate for beginners.Q: webpack how to handle vue-loader-common-chunk-vue-runtime for multiple components I've created multiple vue-cli 4 projects. In all projects I use vue-loader-common-chunk-vue-runtime in order to have all my components and their runtime in one bundle. The thing is that I don't use the require prop for all components. Each components has its own require. So the bundle does not get bigger. In my main.js file I have the following code: import Vue from 'vue' import App from './App' new Vue({ render: h => h(App) }).$mount('#app') Now I added a new component for which I also use the require prop in the vue.config.js file: module.exports = { configureWebpack
