Surface area and interface stability are critical factors in the administration of drug nanoparticles. We studied the surface area and interfacial stability of four anticoagulant nanoparticles. A range of nanoparticle zeta potentials was used to determine the effect of particle surface charge on the stability of nanoparticles on the air/water interface. The electrosteric stabilization of the lipid nanoparticles and size exclusion of the polymer nanoparticles were investigated using an inversion method to determine the effect of particle size on stability. A comparison of the particle sizes determined by the two methods showed good agreement, but the two methods resulted in diameters that were inconsistent with each other. Particle size distribution analysis suggested that the inverted particle size increases during the inversion experiment. The inversion method reported here is potentially useful for the study of the interfacial stability of drug nanoparticles.Q: Change value of a field using PFQuery I need to load all the records in Parse and then filter it using a field.
